But there is a further historical dimension to Christ Recrucified. There are many references to bolshevism in the novel, and the refugees encamped outside the village, who apply in vain to the villagers for help and finally, when none is forthcoming, take up the offensive, are branded by both villagers and Turks as bolsheviks.

NIKOS KAZANTZAKIS: CHRIST RECRUCIFIED - Historical Museum

"Kazantzakis barely escaped excommunication for Christ Recrucified, set in a remote Greek village under Turkish occupation, where the villagers put on a Passion Play and find themselves taking their roles on into their everyday lives" (Clute & Grant, 532). Written during the final stages of the Greek Civil War, Kazantzakis' novel is "an implicit and sustained allusion" to that conflict and also "a modern parable of man's inability to grasp the means of his own salvation ...
