The death of deference. The global conflicts hastened the crumbling of old class structures. In a couple of decades in the third quarter of the 20th century phrases such as "your elders and betters", "knowing your place" and having "ideas above your station" passed from commonplaces to anachronisms. Among those born in the 1990s and after,...

The death of deference. It is not difficult to see both threats and opportunities. Already, we see companies harnessing the lack of deference of patient groups to influence payers. We also see society's lack of deference towards large life science companies contributing to our sector's often-poor industry reputation.

Hasten the death of deference in the civil service. This involves leaders more actively building the capabilities and confidence of their people. Years ago, when I was the new director of the prime minister's top management programme, the cabinet secretary, Richard Wilson, dropped in on the first day. We'd never met.
